

..and Kyroot said:

Once a man Sees

he may then embrace the meaningless illusions of life with all apparent enthusiasm.

...and Kyroot said:

Ordinary man accepts his dissatisfaction as being other than it is.

He calls it, emotional and mental problems, material difficulties, etc., when it all arises from the ever-unfinished upper level of his very own nervous system.

...and Kyroot said:

No lateral, I-level observations are profitable since they must fit into predetermined slots, and be subjectively judgemental.

...and Kyroot said:

All human activity is unknowingly directed toward affecting completion.

...and Kyroot said:

Those who can See can peer into mens' eyes and view the emptiness and lateral captivity.

...and Kyroot said:

The probelms of man can never be solved inthat they are his ordinary consciousness.

...and Kyroot said:

There is faith and there is trust.

Faith is the hopeful ignorance of the ordinary and is always tied to thought - thinking about your faith,

while trust is a non-verbal assurance silently
arrising from the understanding of those who Know.

...and Kyroot said:

The secret clue to Awakening is not in finding a solution,
but is in
discovering the problem.

...and Kyroot said:

There is unknown territory at both ends of the nervous system;
the musky dark of the past
and the blinding uncertainty
of the future,

and

ordinary, civilized men fear
them both.

...and Kyroot said:

Understanding is conditionally satisfying

while ordinary knowledge is absolutely disconcerting.

...and Kyroot said:

The past is properly implanted in the lower levels of the nervous system, and ordinary games such as psychiatry will not be somehow allowed to do that which appears to be its aim, that is, undo a man's past which would leave him blank.

His thorny past and desperate memories are now him, and this growth process up the spine in time is not to somehow now be undone, or the man himself would become undone.

...and Kyroot said:

In the struggle to Awaken

anything you have already thought of is useless.

...and Kyroot said:

To have any real Work possibility, a person must have had the inherent wiring potential to be everyone, that is, every mortal type of nervous system transformers.

These wiring possibilities must have been biologically and genetically conceivable, and one's psychological environment must have been so that such unlimited potential was not destroyed.

...and Kyroot said:

Even among those passionately discussing their notions of the Work
there is only a need for new, unfillable prescriptions,

and no
demand
at all
for a final
cure.

(and you can quote me on that.)

...and Kyroot said:

No system, including man, can conceive of itself from its own level.

And no system can be both studied as a certain object,
and a continuing process.

(And the question of, "Which shall it be?", is not even available to those who have to ask.)

...and Kyroot said:

All forms of creation require the destruction of some other form, and the so-called evils of mortal life could be viewed as an intrinsic after-effect of the original creation.

(And the Work might be seen as certain mens' attempt to reverse creation's original destruction.)

...and Kyroot said:

The mind uses words so that expectation of alternatives are offered,
while the end result is just the opposite.

...and Kyroot said:

All news is bad news

because it is from the past.....

(does'nt that give anyone a hint.)

...and Kyroot said:

A hobby can never be a real hobby unless its just a hobby.

...and Kyroot said:

Once the tricks are exposed and the methods explained and a man
begins to see,

the aim of the Work is no longer seen as the attempt to make an awakened person from a sleeping blob,
but
is an enterprise to produce an extended process from
a limited system.

...and Kyroot said:

Since all maps are non living sketches, the cartographer must be available to furnish the necessary breath-of-meaning, or else the maps become but additional markers in the graveyard of the lost.

...and Kyroot said:

The more Awakened, and curitively explanatory is a Work map the less is its attraction.

Little, fragmented, piece-meal maps, apparently pointing to particular "problem areas" are always
the most welcome.

...and Kyroot said:

A more alert man would not have to carry about worry beads to placate nervous movement;
he knows where a better version lies in the skull.

...and Kyroot said:

The ordinary mind is made to be troubled.

Stilled waters are useless seas,

and the only systems at rest are undertakers on strike.

...and Kyroot said:

During the past peace time of the Kingdoleum Empire there arose a certain military scholar. He carefully studied the recorded and oral histories of all the world's great battles, their generals, and their tactics. His subsequent writings and explanations of warfare raised his fame therein to an unparalled height, and the whole Empire recognized him as its greatest military therotentian.

The day came that the Northern Mongols declared war on the Empire, and the emperor immediately placed the peoples' defense in the hands of the military scholar. A great army was raised, and the scholar, along with all of his notes and knowledge, lead the forces across the Dion Plains to confront the unruly Mongols. Once over the Plains, the scholar rode up to the crest of the first mountain in the early morning hours to await the coming onslaught. The first rays of the morning light found him astride his trusty steed, his notes and battle plans in hand, looking toward the opposing ridge wherever the Mongols were soon expected to charge.

Suddenly, far in the distance a rumbling sound was heard; dust began to rise over the opposing ridge, and as the mighty Mongol hordes began to crest the ridge, the scholar's fine reputation was forever lost, as he was heard to scream,

"Ga-ad-damn, where the fuck did all those guys come from?"