This one semi-interesti chap I recently encountered confidently confided to me, "Hey, if Life really wanted you to change Life'd MAKE you change."

Over in another satellite zone I ran across an outpost whose activities I must assume was reflected in a sign posted just outside their camp, which said,
"The Interrogation,
And If Necessary,
Torture Of Information'

"Sometimes, when out in the wildes alone, I think I can almost hear Nature speaking to me."

"And what does She say?"

"Could you move over a bit,you're blocking my view."

One father gave his son the following musical (I guess) advice, "If you've got a cheap organ look for a cheap band."

Once, after a particularly frustrating bout of mental incompetency, one guy thought, "If my brain ever got as hard as my pecker I'll be a sight to behold.", and "local-conditions"
overhearing this commented,
"If it ever does, big boy, come up and see me
sometime."

Why settle for mere "brown-and-serve" brains?

In case you've never looked at it in this perspective, no conversions are necessary inasmuch as in a three dimensional atmosphere all information is already digital.

Overheard in another, more easterly time zone, "My friends, my dear, dear friends, I'm so pleased to be here that I almost wish I were actually here."

In most places, gazing off into the distance can make you look intelligent, except for this one world where they've moved the far-away up real close.

Least you tend to get too complacent, or cynical, do remember this:
Those who have a motto
NEED a motto.

One promising lad, obviously suspecting that even in a limited dimensional world possibilities still exist, developed as his initial maximum the following,
"The proof is in the pudding, or else in the sauce."

In this one cosmic territory all of their intellectual recipes begin thusly, "First, clear off the counter completely,
then break three
extra large brains..."

...and Kyroot said:

Between meltdowns, this one fellow bemused, "Hah, I've got it all figured out now, the fun's in the failin'."

I overheard this one up-and-coming lad say that his current project was in constructing a fire wall for his mind.

When in the grips of one of his secretive moods, this one chap would wink at his sister and say,
"Cordoroy's the LAST place they'll look."

Every time his inner vehicle would overheat this neat, near-beat little ole timer would sing out,
"Blessed-my-aunt-Tilda, I'm just a symptom of my former self."

The latest motto I've run across in my travels was in that cosmic stretch over to our east-almost;
it comes from a brash band of highly charged chargers, (and not several of them even have it tattooed on their semis), and it goes, "Begin Until Finished."

One gentleman, upon preparing to wind himself up, mentally to approach a particularly perplexing question spoke unTO himself thusly, "I say, normally I wouldn't bring this up, but...", and his brain interrupted,
and said, "My name's not Normally."

You can either be entertained by man , (Secondary), by Nature. (Primary). or by yourself - extraordinary!
